Solution Manual: Stewart Calculus Early Transcendentals 8th Ed.: Chapter 3 - Section 4

Yet man to man, whom, of all created beings, concord would most become, and who stands most in need of it, neither nature, so powerful and irresistible in every thing else, can reconcile; neither human compacts unite; neither the great advantages which would evidently arise from unanimity combine, nor the actual feeling and experience of the dreadful evils of discord cordially endear. Fundamental ideas as democracy, republic, social justice, humanity and universal brotherhood have been however always common to .
